

Should we be a person who gives or receives?

Nowadays, more and more people become greedy and selfish due to the desire for material wealth or fame. Many people believe that it is better to give than to receive so that we can make a better world. When we give cheerfully and accept gratefully, everyone is blessed. You have probably heard the familiar adage. In my opinion, there is no doubt that giving is celebrated. In other words, I totally agree that it is better to give than to receive.

Firstly, giving can benefit a team. When we are working in teamwork, a giver, who provides suitable advice and encouragements, makes the team work more efficiently. For example, when we are doing group projects, there must be a leader who plays the role of giver, who leads the group and does some hard work so that the team can function well. Besides, giving is good for society since it works in a team. Therefore, being a giver is advantageous to a group.

Secondly, giving can strengthen our relationships and open us up to wholesome new ones. A giver in a relationship is someone who really thinks about what another person wants and needs. In fact, this makes a very favourable impression on friends or even new friends. For instance, would you befriend someone who does not care about your feelings? The answer is obvious - definitely not. As a result, being a giver in a relationship can receive more friends.

Finally, giving is a blessed experience and the biggest advantage is receiving by yourself. Giving also means helping others when they are in difficulty. When we help someone and make them happy, we become even happier. If we decide to help in some way, we will benefit the most because it will create amazing joy. For example, we will feel delighted and satisfied after doing charity work. On the other hand, people in need are also benefited due to our help. As a result, giving is a meaningful action.

To summarize, giving is favourable to efficient teams and friendly relationships. Furthermore, it is also advantageous to yourself as giving makes us become fulfilled. Therefore, there is no doubt that it is better to give than to receive. In order to make a better world, we have to be a giver. Should we hesitate to give what we have?
