

A Terrible Disaster

‘Oh my god! I really couldn’t believe what these students had done!’ I exclaimed. I brought my crystal ball with me back to my nest last week because it would give me random future visions. When I touched the glowing moonstone crystal ball, I blacked out for 2 seconds. What I saw was that CNECCC was half-abandoned, the canteen was full of leftover which attracted lots of maggots, and it smelt like rotten flesh on campus. Only 20% of students were learning in the classroom which was full of cobwebs and students were using the candles to light up the pitch-black classroom. It was the disastrous consequence of students wasting energy and resources. They never turned off the lights or fans when they left the classroom and wasted heaps of food every day.

“No! I’ve got to do something about it!” I shouted. Then, I got back up and wrote a note to students ‘Don’t waste energy! You’ll end up having a disaster!’ Then, a janitor thought it was some sort of trash, so she threw it into the bin. I tried reaching for one of the students who could understand bird language but he just told me indifferently, ‘How ridiculous! Who cares about saving energy? I can do whatever I want.’ None of the ideas I was plotting was working. I gave up and went back to the nest, full of disappointment and frustration to rest.

A week later, it was raining heavily, and the sky was grey. The school lights kept flickering and the projectors were turned on and off. It was because the kids at school always turned on the lights when there was no one in the classroom. The school couldn’t afford the electricity bill anymore since everyone wasted energy. The foul maggots suddenly came out. It was the same as my visions. My friend cried and apologized, ‘I’m sorry for not believing you. I should’ve warned my friends to stop being wasteful!’ But it was too late. The school was shut down and it needed to be rebuilt.
